

Stringing FAQs

What are the different string types?

Synthetic Gut

Synthetic Gut is one of the most common strings, usually made of nylon these strings offer a low-cost option for players and offer good comfort and feel but lack the durability of polyester strings.

Recommended for younger players and social players

Polyester Strings

Poly strings are our most popular choice for players, providing greater durability, control and spin than synthetic gut or multifilament strings, but less power and comfort.

Generally used by intermediate and advanced players, recommend for players looking for more spin or are chronic string breakers.

Recommended for tournament and social players that break strings often

Natural Gut

Natural gut strings provide comfort and better power than all other strings and also retain tension the best of all string types.

The downside to natural gut strings is that they are usually the most expensive of all string types and least durable.

Recommended for high level tournament players

Multifilament Strings

String filaments / strands of (usually nylon) are braided together to make a single piece of string to try and mimic the feel of natural gut. Multifilament strings are great for more power and comfort and are also easy on players arms and elbows, they are a great choice if you've recently been suffering or are recovering from an arm injury.

Recommended for younger layers, tournament, and social players

Hybrid Strings

Hybrid Strings aren't so much a type of string, rather just mixing two types of string together.

The most common method is to use a Poly string in the mains and a synthetic/multifilament in the crosses. This helps to add more durability than just synthetic/multifilament and more comfort than all poly strings.

Recommended for younger players who are breaking strings often, tournament and social players

Stringing FAQs

How often do I need to get my racquet restrung?

The general rule of thumb for how many times a year you should get your racquet restrung is the same number of times you play a week.

For example, if you play three times a week, you should get your racquet restrung three times a year.

Over time, tennis strings will lose tension and elasticity which results in the feeling of dead strings.

While the strings may look fine, the playability has been greatly reduced

Signs that you may need to replace your strings

- Strings feel dead
- Loss of power
- Loss of control
- Fraying of strings - some gut and multifilament strings fray as they get close to breaking
- Notching strings - as strings wear into each other, this creates a notch on the main string bed, if you notice deep notches on your strings, it may be time for a restring as they are getting close to breaking

Stringing FAQs

Why do my strings feel loose or dead?

Strings can often lose tension over time or if not stored correctly

Strings can be affected by many outside factors, over time strings will lose tension and start to feel dead.

Temperature can have an effect on how strings feel, during summer months especially, heat can cause string to prematurely lose tension. Temperature fluctuations can cause strings to expand and contract which can greatly reduce tension retention as well as the durability of the string.

It is important to store your racquet in a cool dry place, such as a tennis bag or indoors.

Do not leave your racquet sitting in a car as this will cause damage to your strings, leading to decreased tension and premature breakages.
